KING ENUMERATES RIGHTS DEFECTS

"I still sing We Shall Overcome."
So said Dr. Martin Luther King at one of the largest convocations in Sacramento State College history, where some 7000 students crowded into the Sacramento State College football stadium to hear Rev. King speak on "The Future of the Civil Rights Movement."

After King was introduced by Senator Mervyn F. Dymally (D-Watts), he stated that there were three ways that the civil rights movement could be viewed. He said that the extreme optimists would "contend that great strides have been made in the area of race relations", and that there is little else to be done. He said that the pessimists would indicate that "very moderate strides have been made, and the problem really can't be solved, as human nature is unchangeable, with no possibility for brotherhood in our country."

The realistic viewpoint on the other hand, he stated, combines both arguments and avoids extremes. He said there is agreement that strides have been made and "that the movement has come a long way, but that there is a long way to go before the problem is solved."

King said that the Negro has a long history of both slavery and feeling of inferiority. He said that as a result of slavery, the Negroes lost faith in themselves and felt that perhaps they were inhuman. With the coming of urban industrialization, a burgeoning cultural life and lessening of illiteracy, a new sense of pride and concern was instilled in the Negro race.

King stated that the Negro found that he could no longer be concerned merely with his skin color, but that his intrinsic worth could only be measured by his mind and soul. He also said that with a new sense of dignity and self-responsibility, the Negro has come to realize that he must "struggle and sacrifice to be free."

Changes have taken place in terms of eradication of legal segregation. (continued on page 6)
